"The Nutty Professor meets Bugs Bunny by way of The Incredible Hulk: The Incredible Hare Story"

 Middlesex

"The Nutty Professor meets Bugs Bunny by way of The Incredible Hulk: The Incredible Hare Story" Once upon a time, Joe Strike had an idea for a kids' TV show, a tongue-in-cheek comedy about a shy young lab assistant who turns into a heroic anthro rabbit in times of stress and danger. Ambitious fellow that he was, Joe took his idea to Hollywood...and was completely ignored. Undeterred, Joe wrote his character's origin story as a kids' novel, took it to the publishing world...and was completely ignored. Still undeterred, Joe set up a Kickstarter campaign in order to self-publish...and missed his goal by a mere $3,000. A wiser man would've given up long ago...but not Joe. Learn why he's continuing his Wile E. Coyote-like effort to bring "The Incredible Hare" to life. Joe will reveal the surprising inspiration for his character before screening the TV show's opening animatic, his Kickstarter video and a never-before seen computer animation test. 'Born This (Furry) Way—or Not?'

 Middlesex

Did the idea of anthropomorphic animals—perhaps even being one—always hold an appeal to you, but it was something you could never tell anyone about because you knew no one could possibly understand, and you felt so very alone...until the day you discovered Furry Fandom? (The very common “I’m Not the Only One!” syndrome.) Or maybe you heard about Furry Fandom from a friend, or came across it online and thought “hey, this is pretty cool—I’m going to check it out,” and the next thing you knew you owned a fursuit while building a second one, commissioning art of your fursona doing terrible naughty things and going to six or seven furcons a year? Perhaps that’s a slight exaggeration, but furry fandom spontaneously burst to life in the 1980s when all those “I’m not the only one” people started discovering one another; now the fandom has been around long enough and is popular enough to attract people born without the furry gene but who discovered they loved fur every bit as much. Which category do you fall into? Come and share your story and compare notes with your fellow furs in a panel led by long-time fur Joe Strike. Joe will also read sections of “Furry Nation,” his in-progress book about the fandom’s birth, growth and the people who made it happen.
